

One expert's monologue

First of all, people:

① When they have the time, they think about their daily lives

→ It makes them tired because they have to think

② When they don't have the time, or when they are looking for something or not feeling well, they think about themselves first

→ They don't have the time to worry about others, and they don't want to get tired (they don't care) From my experiences outside so far, I am the kind of person who clearly understands the situations ① and ② above.

First of all,

(1) it's surprising.

(2) Male or female? → Because you've never seen anything like that before in your life.

→ It makes you think and exhausts you.

(Because you can usually tell the difference between male and female with nearly 100% accuracy.)

(3) She looks so much like Ai, which is even more surprising.

(4) Is she a high school student, middle school student, or college student?

(Her height and build make it hard to tell.)

(5) I wonder if she's a volleyball player.

(6) I immediately start researching her on my smartphone.

(7) I'm even more surprised when all sorts of things come up.

(8) Even though she's famous and does almost everything herself as an expert, she looks rich.

I don't understand why she's on welfare, so I'm tired of thinking about it again.

People who already know me only need to check for updates in (6) and (7).

People who I'm meeting for the first time have to do everything from (1) onwards, which is quite exhausting.

Also, elderly people who don't normally use social media are expected to do (1), (3), (4), and (5).based on facts...

While there may be some rare cases where (1) and (2) above apply, I'm probably the only person who does all of (1) through (7).
